

Computational Physiology

Physiology is the study of function. Computational Physiology is therefore the development of mathematical and computer models to describe biological functions. Our focus is in the area of muscular electrophysiology, in particular the muscles of the gastrointestinal tract and the heart. The models we develop are multi-scale in nature and aimed at bridging the gap between genetic defects and clinical pathologies.

